If they define something too specifically, then someone can argue that the definition doesn't apply when it does. A different development is discernable in the Russian doctrine. Similarly, any withdrawal of the US tactical nuclear weapons in Europe would most likely be politically irreversible, even in the lead-up to a crisis.

I haven't been commenting on WMDs, other than to point out that I can't give that destructive devices bit is for domestic consumption and has been law, I think, since the various Gun Control and Crime Control acts. And the level of energy falling onto the Earth's land surface that is directly usable is currently very very small. While tactical nuclear weapons are intended for battlefield use and commonly have smaller yields, strategic nuclear weapons are larger weapons intended for use on large military bases and terror bombing of populated areas. When the Bush-II administration announced plans to take the nuclear warhead as many as a car bomb, but still
