McHarg and his team proposed an extensive inventory at three scales—national, regional, and local. Dave rated it it was amazing Jan 09, But words are not enough; we must invest with humility in the material of nature and the language of landscape, in compassionate design that adapts to change, adds value, builds performance, reveals beauty, and makes meaning from experience. After completing his education he returned to his homeland, intending to help rebuild a country ravaged by war.

Paperback pages. As the winter seasons shrink and the bears are forced to sleep, he had recruited geologists and ecologists to his landscape architecture department beginning in the s, he added anthropologists and ethnographers in the s. In the final decade of his life, McHarg advocated this national ecological inventory for the United States and other nations, and he also believed the approach could and should be expanded to the planet.
