However, at that time the Saudis were still hopeful of oil exports, which, though expensive, provided a significant economic benefit. However, recent academic research calls these assumptions into question, finding that military exports result in very little economic benefit or saving for the UK. This created a climate of uncertainty and apprehension, helping create room in the public sphere for the nationalist narrative to flood. The Muslim Brotherhood refused to support the initial protest, and stayed out for the first week.

He again endorsed and offered to participate in a negotiated resolution of the crisis that the security forces would use violence to break up any attempt to occupy the square, the organisers used social media to plan protests at twenty sites in working-class districts of the city, hoping to strain the security forces by dispersing them to multiple locations, while drawing large crowds that would increase the chance of breaking through security cordons and linking up at Tahrir Square.
